Little Landers was modeled after founder, William Smythe's principles of cooperative farming and agricultural utopian ideals, popular throughout the country in the early 20th century in response to the industrial revolution and cramped conditions of urban living.

The demographics of Little Landers was composed of Anglo-Americans mostly from the East Coast.

The Community was destroyed on January 18, 1916 with the Hatfield Flood which wiped out 25 homes and water facilities.

Bracero Program

Under the Bracero Program, more than 4 million Mexican farm workers came to work the fields of the United States. The braceros were principally experienced farm workers who hailed from agricultural regions in Mexico. Large groups of bracero applicants came via train to the northern border. Their arrival altered the social and economic environments of many border towns. Ciudad Juarez, across the border from El Paso, Texas, became a hotbed of recruitment and a main gathering point for the agricultural labor force.

The Bracero Program contracts were controlled by independent farmer associations and the "Farm Bureau," and were written in English, and many braceros would sign them without understanding the rights they were giving away nor the terms of the employment. At the end of World War II, Mexican workers were ousted from their jobs by workers coming out of wartime industries and by returning servicemen. By 1947, the Emergency Farm Labor Service was working on decreasing the amount of Mexican labor imported. By the 1960s, an overflow of "illegal" agricultural workers along with the invention of the mechanical cotton harvester, diminished the practicality and appeal of the bracero program.

The bracero program is finally repealed, and Mexican American labor leaders see an opportunity to work toward unionizing the farm workers.

1954- Operation Wetback

In 1949 the Border Patrol seized nearly 280,000 illegal immigrants. By 1953, the numbers had grown to more than 865,000, and the U.S. government felt pressured to do something about the onslaught of immigration. What resulted was Operation Wetback, devised in 1954 under the supervision of new commissioner of the Immigration and Nationalization Service, Gen. Joseph Swing.

Swing oversaw the Border patrol, and organized state and local officials along with the police. The object of his intense border enforcement were “illegal aliens,” but common practice of Operation Wetback focused on Mexicans in general. The police swarmed through Mexican American barrios throughout the southeastern states. Some Mexicans, fearful of the potential violence of this militarization, fled back south across the border. In 1954, the agents discovered over 1 million illegal immigrants.

In some cases, illegal immigrants were deported along with their American-born children, who were by law U.S. citizens. The agents used a wide brush in their criteria for interrogating potential aliens. They adopted the practice of stopping “Mexican-looking” citizens on the street and asking for identification. This practice incited and angered many U.S. citizens who were of Mexican American descent. Opponents in both the United States and Mexico complained of “police-state” methods, and Operation Wetback was abandoned.

San Diego May Spread to Border

City Will Call Vote Despite Threats of Chula Vista Suit

SAN DIEGO. April 15 (AP)—The City Council today declared its intention of calling a special annexation election that would extend the city limits to the Mexican border.

It acted within an hour after a petition, bearing 991 signatures of South Bay area residents, was presented to the City Clerk. He said 600 names would have been sufficient.

May 6 Hearing

The Council set a hearing for May 6 on the proposal.

The city of Chula Vista, which has sought to annex a corridor that could block San Diego's expansion to the south, has threatened court action. The area proposed for annexation to San Diego covers 22 square miles and includes Palm City, Nestor, farm lands in the Tijuana River Valley, San Ysidro and Otay Mesa.

Water issues in San Ysidro started the idea of annexation but San Diego wanted to dissolve San Ysidro into itself so it could have a stake in international trade.

Inserting these illegal tunnels into the official map produces a very different image of the border. The linear rigidity of the artificial geopolitical boundary that has flattened the living complexity of the natural is transformed back into a complex set of porous lines perpendicular to the border. As these lines puncture the border in our fictional cartography, they almost restore the primacy of the network of existing canyons, juxtaposing the natural with the socio-economic flows that continue to be under the radar.

SAN YSIDRO — A group of about 100 people trying to illegally cross the border Sunday near the San Ysidro port of entry threw rocks and bottles at U.S. Border Patrol agents, who responded by using pepper spray and other means to force the crowd back into Mexico, federal officials said.

Immigrant-rights groups in San Diego said they didn't know beforehand about the plan to rush the border, and they worry that desperation is driving homeless deportees to make a bold bid to rejoin their families in the United States.

Border-security groups see this situation as evidence that the border remains unsecured, something they said should be fixed before Congress considers proposals to grant legal status to unauthorized immigrants.

The incident occurred about a quarter-mile west of the San Ysidro border crossing in the Tijuana River channel. No one was seriously injured, no shots were fired and no arrests were made.

This type of rush on the border has not been seen since the late 1980s and early '90s, when groups of border-crossers would run into the U.S. while agents tried to apprehend as many people as possible. The practice mostly disappeared after Operation Gatekeeper began in 1994 and brought with it tall fences, walls and more agents.

TIJUANA — The new mayor of this city of more than 1.6 million residents says crime-fighting will be a priority of his administration, and public support will be key to his success.

“In the past, we have observed wise decisions that have allowed us to live in a safer city, this is undeniable” Astiazaran said in a speech following his inauguration on Saturday night, as he called for continued coordination with state and federal law enforcement agencies. “In the present, we must redouble our efforts,” said the 51-year-old physician.

Astiazaran has named a new public safety secretary, Alejandro Lares Valladares, who most recently served as the Tijuana police department’s international liaison officer. Fluent in English, and a graduate of the FBI Academy, Lares takes over the helm of the 2,190-officer department from Alberto Capella.

All five of Baja California’s five municipalities are launching new administrations. Three are headed by members of Mexico’s Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), while two are headed by the National Action Party (PAN). The municipalities are saddled with large public debts, and the new mayors need to find ways to rein in public spending while continuing to provide city services.

TIJUANA — A protest against Mexico’s newly approved sales tax hike for border areas brought several dozen drivers to steer through Tijuana’s streets on Sunday afternoon. The “Caravan of Repudiation” ended an hour after it started, with collective honking outside the municipal office of Mexico’s ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party, the PRI.

The demonstration was the latest show of discontent in Baja California following legislative approval last month of a 5 percent sales tax increase for border areas — from 11 percent to 16 percent. Set to go into effect on Jan. 1, the measure ends the lower rate for areas of the country considered border regions, and creates a uniform sales tax for all of Mexico.

The change would end more than three decades of differential treatment for border zones, which include the entire states of Baja California and Baja California Sur, a 12.5-mile zone that runs along Mexico’s northern border, and parts of the states of Chiapas and Quintana Roo on the southern border.

The PRI’s leader in Tijuana, Jose Luis Hernandez Silerio, said the reform would offer new unemployment benefits and pensions for the elderly. He mentioned the possibility of greater federal funding for the border. “We all want a border that’s more competitive, border crossings that are more agile,” he said.

Last week Representative Luis Gutierrez (D-IL) joined a demonstration in Washington D.C. to protest the refusal of President Obama to use his executive powers to halt the deportations of the undocumented. With over 392,000 deportations in 2010, more than in any of the Bush years, many activists fear we are in the midst of a repeat of notorious episodes of the past such as the "Repatriation" campaign of the 1930s and the infamous Operation Wetback of 1954, both of which resulted in the deportation of hundreds of thousands of Latinos.

At the National Council of La Raza's Conference Obama tried to console the audience by saying that he knows "very well the pain and heartbreak deportation has caused." His words failed to resonate. Instead Rep. Gutierrez and others took to the streets, demonstrating that "I feel your pain" statements and appeals to the audacity of hope carry little credibility these days. It is time for a serious change of direction on immigration issues or pretty soon, just as Michelle Alexander has referred to the mass incarceration of African-Americans as the New Jim Crow, we may hear people start to call the ongoing repression of Latinos a "New Operation Wetback."
